Floods can be one of nature's most destructive forces. The damage caused by water's "wetness" is secondary to the crushing pressures of its currents. If water from rain, melting snow or flooding doesn't drain quickly enough, rock and soil can become saturated with water.

Mudslides possess enough force and speed to destroy homes, even entire neighborhoods. In May 1971, heavy rains in St- Jean-Vianney, Que., cause the earth to collapse into a sinkhole. The mudslide that resulted killed 31 people and swept away 35 homes, a bus and several cars.

In addition to their destructive physical force, floods bring with them a more menacing threat. If water levels are high enough, water seeps into houses and buildings, washing through laundry rooms, tool sheds, garages, chemical storage closets, septic tanks and garbage receptacles. Runoff carries chemicals, toxins and waste products that can filter through the water table for long periods of time. Flood victims must be extremely cautious about the water they drink, the food they eat, and how they bathe themselves.

Read the passage and decide whether the sentences below are TRUE or FALSE

Many parents are concerned that their children will spend time on social networking which they could be using to do their homework, exercises, or interact with people in the real world. They may feel that social networking sites are a waste of their children's time. However, new research claims that the communication opportunities provided by social networking encourage young people to explore their interests, develop technical skills, and work on new forms of self-expression. The three-year study carried out by a University of California research team that interviewed over 800 teens and conducted over 2000 hours of online observations. It found that social networking helps teenagers learn the social and technical skills they need to be knowledgeable citizens in the digital age.

The study concludes that social networking contributes to young people's extended friendships and interests. While the majority of teens use social networking sites to "hang out" with people they already know in real life, some use them to find like-minded people. Those interested in chess or international politics, for example, can expand their circle with others who share the same interests and can find information that goes beyond that they have access to at school. They can also publicize and distribute their music, art work, or writing to online audiences, and gain visibility and enhance their reputations. Teenagers create new modes of self-expression and rules for social behavior online. New forms of online media allow them to acquire technical skills through creating videos, writing blogs or customizing their online profiles. The researchers said teens usually respect one another's authority online, and they are often more motivated to learn one another than from their parents or other adults.

Social networking has become a societal reality. Children and teens commonly use these sites to interact like adults. With social networking such an important part of youth social culture, it can be extremely difficult to completely keep teens away from social networks. Instead, it is better for parents to allow their kids to access the appropriate websites while teaching them to use them safely and responsibly.
